À propos Sirena par Fulvio Bianconi

Vase Sirene model 4201 par Fulvio Bianconi, Venini Murano Italie. Verre soufflé de couleur ambre, irisé, décoration en verre blanc dit lattimo. En 1950, Bianconi réalise une série de sculptures en verre, certaines représentant des sujets marins (sirènes et poissons) de manière ludique, et d'autres explorant le thème du corps féminin. Plusieurs de ces pièces ont été exposées avec succès lors de la grande exposition itinérante Italy at Work, organisée aux États-Unis entre 1950 et 1953. Beaucoup de ces sculptures se caractérisent par une technique d'application de fils « lattimo » qui se détachent sur une surface transparente. D'autres sculptures présentent des décos phéniciennes qui, comme les décos « lattimo », sont également utilisées sur des vases aux lignes de base douces.

— Netted decoration and macchie. These artefacts are characterised by a technique made of an applied network of lattimo threads in relief on a transparent surface, usually in greenish glass. [12]

The netted decoration also characterises some vases with soft basic lines and others with anthropomorphic female shapes of which Bianconi designed various models, also without decoration or embellished with Phoenician festoons (Nos. 4421, 4333), these too produced thanks to the ability of Ermete Toso, who excelled in the execution of 'torsos of women'.²¹ The theme of the female body returns several times in the artist's work. In this latter series (Nudes) and in the two models of bathers shown in the American exhibition, it is tackled openly, while in other productions it emerges through details such as little relief effects suggesting breasts (see pezzati a tessere triangolari — patchwork with triangular tesserae — and merletti — lace work) or with forms suggesting the pelvis and legs (see merletti). Significant examples of Bianconi's artistic research could also be appreciated on the occasion of the 25th Venice Biennale (1950) in which the Venini glassworks participated with, among other things, a 'group of glass pieces based on the chromatic fantasies of Fulvio Bianconi', which once again elicited the enthusiastic appreciation of Giuseppe Dell'Oro and contributed to the winning of the diploma of honour by the firm.²² [13]

Among these works, the series of vases with macchie (patches) is characterised by the abstract decoration in dark, amorphous shapes.
